Studying the Expansion of the Brain Network of Musical Instrument Playing by fMRI. Although musical aptitude can be improved through training, the neural correlates of this plasticity are still not understood. To shed light on this issue, we investigated brain plasticity in trained musicians by comparing brain activation patterns of musicians and nonmusicians during a musical instrumental task (musical notes detection) and a control task (combination of color and location detection). On the basis of behavioral data and stimulus-related functional magnetic resonance imaging (fMRI) activity, a network of brain regions was activated by notes detection and consisted of left hemisphere nodes (Heschl's gyrus, STG, and amygdala), right hemisphere nodes (insula, hippocampus, and cerebellum), and frontoparietal nodes (precuneus/cuneus, PMC, and cerebellum). Analysis of univariate activations revealed that this network was not activated by notes detection in nonmusicians. Conversely, in musicians, the network was significantly activated during notes detection and showed increased connectivity between the amygdala and the right Heschl's gyrus, 0cc13bf012
